“Keto dogs!”
The ANZAC image in Commando comics

Dr Philip Cass and Dr Jack Ford
PHILIP
For generations of Australians and New Zealanders, Commando Comics have provided a consistent image of their people at war. Inevitably tall, bronzed and contemptuous of authority, their ability as warriors is such that their mere presence on the battlefield is enough to have the Germans crying “Donner und blitzen!” the Italians “Sapristi!” and the Japanese “Aieee!”

How accurate is this depiction of Australians and New Zealanders? How well does a Scottish comic, often employing artists from Argentina and other countries, portray ANZACs? And what happens when Commando attempts to deal with historical issues such as the Land Wars?

The answers to these questions also provide answers to larger questions. Drawing on work by Ross Laurie (2014), Mauricio Castro and Alicia Decker (2012), Cord Scott (2011), Alexander Clarkson (2008) and Mel Gibson (2008)- and acknowledging the ongoing AHRC-funded project on comics and the world wars being carried out by Jane Chapman - this paper seeks to ask what function they perform as sources of history, creators of national imagery and ideas of soldiering.
War comics in Australia and New Zealand

At least seven war comics were produced in Australia before the 1960s. A distinction can be made between newspaper comic strip compilations (e.g. Footrot Flats) and comic books, which had one or more stories. The seven were:

* Bluey and Curly* (newspaper strip)
* Wally and the Major* (newspaper strip)
* Wanda the War Girl* (WW II only)
* Chesty Bond* (WW II only)
* The Phantom Commando* (1950s)
* Avian Tempest* (1950s)
* Billy Battle* (1950s)

Wanda the War Girl was a full colour comic, in which the heroic - but frequently scantily-dressed - Wanda foiled a variety of Axis enemies. She was an obvious copy of the popular Jane comic strip from the Daily Mirror in the UK. Chesty Bond used an already existing advertising character to fend off the Japanese hordes, clad for the occasion in his white, athletic singlet.

Of the Australian WWII comics, only Bluey and Curly and Wally and the Major titles continued after the war, with their characters drawn in civilian life. This may indicate that their popularity lay in their depiction of the funny, Australian larrikin rather than serious, heroic soldier.
The other 1950s war comics were monthly productions featuring a variety of characters, some of them clearly ex-servicemen, in a variety of adventures. We have yet to find anyone who has seen copies of Billy Battle, The Phantom Commando or Avian Tempest outside the expensive world of comic collecting. This month the starting ebay price of a The Phantom Commando comic was $17.

The importation of comics was banned during the war as an austerity measure. This made a market for locally produced comics in Australia and New Zealand. This ban was lifted after the war but then partly reinstated in the 1950s. The part-ban came as a result of moral panic caused by the book Seduction of the Innocent, which claimed that US horror comics presented a grave, moral threat to antipodean children. The later resumption of full importation sounded the death knell for local artists, but not for printers and distributors. They continued to produce local versions of US imported titles, such as Felix the Cat (ironically, an Australian creation) or The Phantom.

To the best of our knowledge, no war comics were produced in New Zealand during World War II or after. This may be because the best New Zealand comic artists had gone to work in Australia.

The 1950s are referred to as the ‘Silver Age’ of comics due to their influence here, pre-television. We disagree, as there were larger numbers and more variety of comics produced in the 1960s.
History of Commando comics

With no local industry to speak of, depictions of New Zealanders and Australians at war came mainly from British comics. There were very few depictions of Australians in US war comics. What little there was seems to be reprints of Australian material.

British war comics dominated US war comics because the stories were more relevant to Australians. They had stories covering the period 1 September 1939 to 6 December 1941, when the US was not in WWII. As well, US war comics tended to be styled on the superhero mould, such as Sgt. Rock, Sgt. Fury and His Howling Commandos, The Losers, The Unknown Soldier or The Haunted Tank. British comics tended to be about joint efforts.

The first British war comics were launched by Amalgamated Press (A.P.) & Fleetway Library Publications:

WAR PICTURE LIBRARY in September 1958 to December 1984
AIR ACE LIBRARY in 1960 to 1970
WAR AT SEA PICTURE LIBRARY in 1962 (only lasted to 1963).
ACTION PICTURE LIBRARY in 1969 (only lasted to 1970).

In competition, D.C. Thomson launched the then Commando War Stories in Pictures in July 1961.
Why, then, was there this proliferation of British war comics from 1958-62? Editor of Battle Picture Library Steve Holland stated in 2007:

Thanks to the post-war baby boom, the late 1950s and early 1960s were filled with the cries of children “What did you do in the war, Dad?” Biographies of war heroes were topping the bestsellers charts and the film industry was quick to catch on with blockbuster movies such as THE DAMBUSTERS and REACH FOR THE SKY.

Launched from 13 to 17 years after the end of World War II, these British comics could employ artists who were returned servicemen, thus guaranteeing a degree of image accuracy often missing in US war comics of the same period. Commando is the only British war comic still in production.

By the early 1990s, with comic collections promoted as an investment strategy, the range of comics on open sale disappeared almost overnight. Comics became the exclusive preserve of collectors’ Comic Book Stores. Commando still sold to the older, nostalgic comic buyer, who just wanted a quick read and bought it on the way home, rather than go through the ‘Serious Collector’ treatment experienced at the small, elitist Comic Book Stores.
Unlike the English-based ‘Library’ comics, Commando was produced by Scottish publisher, DC Thomson, which, in the 1930s, pioneered the British comic industry with the printing of Beano. Commando, with its distinctive shape, glossy, colour covers and distinctive black & white art, has provided a monthly diet of adventure and derring-do for more than 50 years. Once primarily concerned with the Second World War, Commando now tells stories from a variety of conflicts and feature characters from dozens of nations or time periods.

Commando comics have had a marked effect on popular culture, especially in the UK, where they provided stylistic inspiration for many punk bands and major players in what was termed the New Wave of British Heavy Metal such as Iron Maiden, Saxon and Manowar. Now printed in Germany to save costs, Commando’s sales have fallen severely from a peak of about 800,000 in the 1980s.

However, they remain popular, especially with older readers who have either never stopped reading them or who have rediscovered them. Research and anecdotal evidence suggests, however, that the Commando readership is not exclusively male.
The Anzac connection

With a readership throughout the British Commonwealth and across the globe, Commando publishes stories featuring non-British characters. If you visit the Commando home page you can see stories based on many nationalities. Among them are members of a strange breed called ANZACs. We haven’t been able to find an ‘Anzacland’ or ‘Anzaclandia’ but it appears to be a mythical antipodean realm where Australians and New Zealanders come from. For Commando, the use of its ANZACs in a story is highly valued. Former Commando editor George Low said in 2007:

...a struggling script-writer who couldn’t get one particular plot right. His idea was just too ordinary and didn’t have sparkle. ...all seemed lost until, finally, the author brightened up and said, “What if I made it Aussies? It would seem a lot more exciting then.”

...he did have a point. Somehow the inclusion of the word ANZAC fires the imagination and opens up new angles to get the reader turning the page to see what happens next.

JACK

Indeed the second 1961 issue of Commando “They Call Him Coward” featured Australians in New Guinea in 1942. An instant attention-grabber in Australia for this new war comic, it prompted interest and promoted future sales.

PHILIP

Commando is produced in Scotland. So how on earth can we expect a Scot to portray an accurate picture of a New Zealander or an Australian? The answer is that mostly they did not, for while the publishers were Scots, the stories were often written by freelance authors and the artwork was mostly farmed out to South American or European artists who could be employed cheaply. So for the young person growing up on our side of the world, it is likely, that the thrilling tale of daring Australians defeating Rommel single-handedly was written by an Englishman and drawn by an Argentinian!
The typical Anzac

JACK
The term ANZAC stands for the Australian and New Zealand Army Corps. It should only apply to the troops serving at Gallipoli or the Greek Islands in 1915 or in the Greece & Crete Campaign in 1941. The term ‘ANZAC’ may be a popular label but is inaccurate. For Australians, ‘Digger’ is the better term.

So what is the typical Commando ANZAC like?
One of the observations about the way that Australians are depicted is that they always seem to be wild colonial boys, losing their shirts, running around in tiny shorts and looking and acting like rugby players! They are disrespectful to their officers, especially Pommys; always stick up for their mates and are often called Bluey or Snowy. They speak in slang that is no longer in common usage and which was dying out even when Phil & I were boys in the 1960s. We are not sure they ever yelled “Crikey cobber, here come the Nips!” but perhaps, because the writers were British veterans, the words were very close to it. The characters are often drawn as quite solid and muscly characters, a long way from the lanky larrikin stereotype of Bluey and Curly or by Chips Rafferty in the 1960 film The Sundowners.

US
And, of course, in each comic, they ultimately win against the Axis!

JACK
In many respects these ANZACs are a cliché but I suspect that it is one that we rather like. It is also likely to be closer to the attitudes or behaviour of those, who served in 1939-45, than our own generation. The former editor of Commando George Low sums up the use of this cliché thus:

> We know that not everybody calls everybody else “cobber”....and not every second Aussie is called “Bluey” or “Snowy” .....and not every Kiwi is built like a rugby forward ...but it makes for part of the fun. Source: Low, George (Editor), Commando For Action and Adventure – ANZACS AT WAR, (Sydney: HarperCollins, 2007) p.7.
Antipodean reactions

ME

So how do antipodean readers react to these stories? Our preliminary data indicates that the Commando stereotype is perceived in a similar way to our previous observations. One survey respondent wrote:

Australian always seemed to be scantily clad compared to their allies. Often they seemed rankless and everyone got on well. Officers were tolerated.

They were also seen to be anti-authoritarian, individualistic, well-muscled and prone to fighting only in their shorts and tin hat.

Also in Commando, readers cannot tell Australians from New Zealanders, unless the Kiwis are wearing a lemon squeezer hat. In fact, it does seem that all the men of ‘Anzaclandia’ are indistinguishable. Kiwis are just a subset of Australia.

How do they fare as historical documents?

JACK

In the 1960s and 70s, schools’ History subjects did not investigate the progress of World War II but rather simplified its study down to the 10 Causes of the War. Commando acted as a teaching source, not only through its use of historical battles and sites in stories but also through the inclusion of facts on equipment profiles (e.g. aircraft cockpit designs), unit identification patches, badges & rank markers, WWII black & white photos, fact quizzes and battle snippets.

Current Commando editor Callum Laird:

Antony Beevor or Max Hastings we ain’t, but maybe we’re a gateway to their interpretations of historical events. Commando strives to provide an authentic and accurate background to stories of action and adventure. We can, and I hope we do, deliver nuggets of history wrapped up in our fictional narratives. That’s all we can do. If that leads any of our readers to go on and look at the events we’ve touched on in more detail, we are delighted.
New Zealand war comics

ME

The image at left comes from a page from the only Commando comic we could find which deals with the colonial wars in New Zealand. The Maori Challenge appeared in 1961. As with other Commando comics the artwork was contracted out to an outside artist.

The story presents the war within the parameters often found in Commando comics – Maori and pakeha fight, the war ends, Maori and pakeha are reconciled and several generations later their descendants fight side by side against the Nazis.

While there were no locally produced New Zealand war comics during or after the Second World War, there have been a small number of graphic novels in recent years dealing with the experiences of Kiwis at war.

On the next slide are covers for ‘Hautipua Rerarangi (Born to Fly), ‘Ngarimu Te Tohu Toa’ (Victory at Point 209) and ‘A Nice Day for a War.’ Significantly, the first two are in Te Reo and are about the achievements of Maori servicemen.
Conclusion

Commando like other British war comics gave a stereotyped view of our military past. But it served to stimulate the interest of those who were born after the Second World War. As Steve Holland said in 2008:

They helped the two generations of children that grew up following V.E. Day make sense of the catastrophic consequences of war and the sacrifices that were made. Fifty years on, they still have the power to thrill and horrify us.
